The thinning of Arctic sea ice contributes to a large-scale atmospheric response from projected 21st century sea ice loss. Compared with sea ice concentration, sea ice thickness further enhances the surface thermodynamic and troposphere circulation anomalies. Changes in sea ice thickness should be considered when assessing Arctic and mid-latitude connections.